Opioid Medication and Medical Cannabis

Millions of Americans suffer from daily chronic pain or other traumatic injuries that often result in doctors prescribing opiate pain relievers to help patients manage symptoms. While opiate pain relievers have helped millions of patients, higher rates of prescribing opioids have also resulted in higher rates of addiction, abuse, and opioid overdose. In fact, according the the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), 28,000 people died from opioid overdose in 2014. This equates to 71 lives lost per day to opioid overdose in 2014.

The shocking statistics around opioid abuse and overdose is no surprise to Humboldt County residents. Our communities have seen the impact of the rise of oxycodone, methadone, and heroin in our communities. As our community members become more aware of the detrimental impact opioids may have on their long term health, many individuals are seeking a safer alternative to address their chronic pain issues. At Humboldt Patient Resource Center (HPRC), our collective has seen a significant increase in patients seeking assistance in addressing the side effects of long term opioid drug use, finding a safe alternative to their opioid medication, or looking for ways to make opioid medication more effective at lower doses.

Some side effects of opioid medication include sedation, dizziness, nausea, vomiting, constipation, physical dependency, tolerance, and respiratory depression. Medical cannabis products have been used for thousands of years to address some of these common side effects. Most notably, cannabis is known for its anti-emetic properties (anti-vomiting) and can assist patients experiencing constipation. Cannabis is also used worldwide for its analgesic properties (reducing pain) and has been effective in lowering and at times ceasing the use of opioid medications for many local patients.

Medical cannabis may be a safer alternative to opioid medicine because of the relationship between the brain stem and breathing. Opioid receptors are densely distributed in the brain stem, and the brain stem regulates breathing. An overdose of opioid medicines may modulate the activities of the brain stem and stop breathing. This results in hypoxia, or deficiency in the amount of oxygen reaching the tissues, which can result in long term brain damage or death. Conversely, cannabinoid receptors are sparsely distributed throughout the brainstem and have not shown to have a significant impact on respiratory processes.

In March of 2016, the CDC urged doctors to avoid prescribing opiate painkillers stating the risks of the drug far outweigh the benefits. There is also growing evidence of medical cannabis as an alternative to opioid medications in states that currently have a regulated medical cannabis structure. According to the Journal of the American Medical Association, states with medical cannabis laws had a 24.8% lower average of annual opioid overdose mortality rates compared with states without medical cannabis laws. This information is supported by our local patients who comment that medical cannabis has helped reduce the dosages of opioids.

It is imperative that patients work closely with their doctors whenever making changes to any prescribed medication. Opioid medication regimens should not be introduced without the assistance of your doctor. Going Nuclear

Editor:

Led by his belief that "this is what legalization looks like," I can't help but ask if Lost Coast Outpost editor Hank Sims has put people in harm's way by publishing the personal information of county residents in the cannabis business ("Growing Pains," Aug. 25).

Consider three parts of his "article." First, in giving his impression of an editor reporting what legalization looks like, he discloses that he knows "the fear of rip-offs is still strong," as if he's inviting crime. Second, he makes it known that this fear makes these residents sensitive about their personal information being published, so, moved by a whim, he decides to not publish addresses and parcel numbers, as if he's dangling a threat but without clearly asking for anything. Third, he says that residents are "rapidly moving out of the shadows" just as voters will get a chance to approve a legalization initiative this November, strangely offering that the odds are almost certain that they will. His thinking seems to be something like, "In the off chance that they don't, I'm taking this editorial opportunity now to go nuclear." And why not, he wrote, "those growers are not hiding any longer."

He concludes with a note that sheds light on his claim that this is what legalization looks like, which is that this is what it looks like in Hank Sims' reality. Just because the information is out there, he will publish it. He seems to find the value in this to be that maybe, if by some odd chance residents didn't already know that their information is out there, they'll know now. Hank Sims' reality is that your information is his public tool.

Is this, in any way, journalism? If it isn't, then what do we say if something does happen?

Recognizing Reality

Editor:

Thanks to letter writers Laura Madjedi and Robert C. Van Fleet (Aug. 25) for sharing personal elaboration toward greater community consciousness of end of life options in Humboldt ("End of Life Options," Aug. 18). As a community, we seem to be like the Buddha as a young prince, coming out of the palace of denial and observing that in reality, life includes old age, sickness and death. Having just returned from a difficult family dialogue to fill out another state's version of the California Physician Orders for Life-Sustaining Treatment form for advance directives, I appreciate that we have more options than before. Clearly, there also is still room for improvement, which will evolve through respectful and visible community dialogue.

DA, Police Chiefs Mull Video Policy

Conflicted, local officials see San Diego as a model

By Thadeus Greenson
thad@northcoastjournal.com

Humboldt County may become just the second county in the nation to adopt a uniform policy governing the release of police officer-involved shooting videos, a move officials hope will increase transparency and trust between law enforcement and the local community.

But just as Humboldt is beginning work on a draft policy, the one it's modeled after is coming under fire in San Diego County.

Humboldt County District Attorney Maggie Fleming recently met with the Law Enforcement Chiefs Association of Humboldt to discuss San Diego's new policy, which generally dictates that police will release video footage from officer-involved shootings after prosecutors have determined whether or not to criminally charge those involved. Local support for the San Diego model seems to be universal, and Fleming said her office is currently working on a draft that closely mirrors it.

"Over the next few months the law enforcement chiefs (association) will be scheduling public meetings in this county to allow people to raise any concerns they might have," Fleming wrote in an email to the Journal. "I hope that these meetings can include the presentation of a concise draft policy similar to the one used in San Diego."

The San Diego policy is widely viewed as a groundbreaking step, especially in California, where public record laws give law enforcement agencies wide discretion in what they release to the public and what they keep confidential. But across the nation, while police patrol car and body-worn cameras have been widely deployed, use of the technology seems to have outpaced the implementation of policies governing what to do with the footage.

As protests have erupted from coast to coast in recent years after officer-involved shootings, often driven by cell phone footage captured by passersby, conversation — and disagreement — about what to do with official footage has kicked into high gear. On one end of the spectrum sits transparency and the departments' need to gain or restore public trust; on the other sit fears of public backlash and increased liabilities.

It should also be noted that this technology is only partially deployed in Humboldt County. The Eureka Police Department has outfitted all of its patrol cars with dash cams and its officers with body-worn cameras, as have departments in Ferndale and Rio Dell. But the Humboldt County Sheriff's Office still doesn't have either technology, with Undersheriff William Honsal saying the department is ultimately working toward getting cameras on all deputies and correctional officers, but the program would cost $80,000 to start and $40,000 a year after that in storage costs. Arcata has cameras in its patrol cars but getting officers body-worn technology is probably a year or so away, Chief Tom Chapman said.

But it's clear all agencies in Humboldt County — and probably the nation — are moving toward this technology, so local officials agreed the time is right to set a universal policy in place.

At its heart, the San Diego model is a compromise. Instituted by District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis, who herself had chosen not to release videos in a number of high profile officer-involved shootings before reversing course, the policy makes the release of such videos the standard, but only after prosecutors have decided whether to bring criminal charges. (In cases where criminal charges are brought, the video would be held as evidence and only made public at trial.) The idea behind holding the videos until the DA's review of a shooting is complete is to make sure that the integrity of the investigation isn't compromised and the fair trial rights of those involved are preserved.

But this provision inherently means

A new policy being considered by the Humboldt County District Attorney's Offfice would make body camera footage from officer-involved shootings public, but some say the policy doesn't go far enough. File

there will be a sizeable passing of time between a critical incident and the release of the video, as district attorney's office reviews of officer-involved shootings generally take months. Consider that the Nov. 1, 2015 shooting of Killian O'Quinn by a California Highway Patrol officer in Eureka remains under review by Fleming's office more than nine months after a seemingly routine traffic stop ended in a fatal shootout.

Eureka Police Chief Andrew Mills seemed to recognize this lengthy review period could cause some problems with a controversial incident. He pointed out that the San Diego policy leaves chiefs some leeway to act in the best interests of their departments and cities, which he'd like to see carried over to whatever policy goes into place in Humboldt County. For example, Mills said if a shooting draws a fierce public backlash and people are "getting ready to riot," Mills would like the flexibility to release video of the incident early, if he thinks it would quell unrest and benefit public safety.

But overall, local officials seem content with much of what San Diego has in place. Honsal said policy looks "great," and fairly balances the public's very real desire to see and evaluate these videos with due process concerns. The public won't be able to instantly see the videos, Honsal said, but will have to "trust the system that's in place," knowing it will have the additional check and balance of viewing the video at a later date. Chapman said he supports the policy and likes the concept, adding that he thinks it's crucial for all local agencies to work together to form a policy they can all follow.

"I feel like we can't wait for the issue to be resolved legislatively," Chapman said. "I just don't see that happening. The technology, the climate is moving much faster than the Legislature is and I think we need to be responsive to that."

But San Diego's policy — officially released in its final form earlier this month — is starting to draw some fire. Both the San Diego Union Tribune and San Diego City Beat ran stories this month critical of various components of the policy, including the lengthy delay between an incident and the release of video footage and provisions allowing departments to alter the videos by blurring the faces of officers, witnesses and "the person shot." Another provision that has drawn criticism from the American Civil Liberties Union and the San Diego defense bar allows that rather than simply releasing these videos to the public, the DA will release them along with a public statement "to provide appropriate and important context."

"The idea that the DA's office would be releasing the video and advocating a position for or against law enforcement, for or against the victim, is inappropriate," Michael Marrinan, a San Diego attorney specializing in police misconduct, told City Beat. "The public should make its decision itself."

Police officials, meanwhile, have countered that it's important for the public not to see these videos in a vacuum and to instead have relevant context. "A video is one part of an event — it doesn't capture everything," said Chapman, noting that professional sports have replays from numerous high definition cameras operated by professionals which still often yield inconclusive results. "The video is one piece of an investigation. There's context and circumstances and emotion — all sorts of different things that the video does not capture."

Some have also been critical that the policy only covers shootings and not all use of force incidents.

Locally, officials concede the issue is complicated and all said they are working to balance transparency with a host of other concerns. While all said they see the balance of interests tipping toward transparency, most said they feel conflicted about making critical incident footage open to public viewing. Mills said it's important to make sure agencies aren't unwittingly "glorifying violence" and catering to "a certain number of people out there who just want to watch gore."

Chapman expounded upon that idea. Officer-involved shootings take an incredible toll, he said. There's a family that has lost a loved one; an officer who has to deal with having killed someone and all the what-ifs that accompany that; and witnesses traumatized by seeing violence first hand. "It is the darkest hour," Chapman said. "There's no worse than that. It's rock bottom."

The prospect of the folks involved in these incidents and their loved ones being subjected to them repeatedly as they are flashed on local news, social media and YouTube is hard to digest, Chapman said.

"Should we see someone being shot?" he asked. "Should you be able to watch that? Because this is real. This is not fiction. It's real-life stuff. Should you, the public, have the right to watch someone die? I'm really stuck right there."

Looking at balancing those concerns with the benefits of transparency, Chapman was then asked if he'd support Humboldt County adopting a policy similar to San Diego's.

"I will support it because I think it's the right thing to do but that doesn't take away from the very real impacts these videos will have on the individuals involved in these incidents who will have to relive them as they're memorialized on Facebook and YouTube," he said. ●

Big Numbers

The Aug. 23 deadline to register existing commercial cannabis activity with the county of Humboldt has come and gone, and the planning and building department is staring down a giant pile of paper. A final count, conducted partially by hand, came up with a total of 2,259 registered grows.

Steve Lazar, senior planner in the Cannabis Services Division, says the lag between receiving registrations and staff's ability to enter information into the county's database means the scale of and type of registered grows are still unclear. Nonetheless, he says the response from the cultivation community has been heartening.

"You have to imagine there's over 10,000 grows in the county," he said, referring to an extrapolation from a study conducted in 2012. "I'm pretty pleased that we got these numbers. Our goal is to get as many people before the end of the year. Our work is still ahead of us."

The permit application deadline for new medical marijuana grows is Dec. 31. Lazar says his department is catching up with registrations right now, and will do some strategic planning as it estimates the processing of what looks to be thousands of applications. The entire process, he says, has been "wild," and the days leading up the registration deadline saw scores of people in the H Street office.

"It was not a typical day for the planning and building department," he says. "But maybe there are no more typical days."

Bad Landlords

Busted for a grow on your land? Go ahead and point the finger down the line at your tenants. As fig leaves go, it's pretty flimsy. But it's not a Humboldt-exclusive phenomenon.

Consider Wayne Robinson of Worcestershire, England, who was sentenced to 14 months in jail for growing 883 plants in the Drakelow Tunnels. The Drakelow Tunnel Network, currently a preserved historical site, consists of 3.5 miles of underground passages and has a storied history as a World War II-era factory site for the Rover car company and a bunker for the British government during the Cold War. Robinson was its caretaker, and gave tours of the site up until the day he was busted, back in November of 2013. His sentence, three years later, comes after a lengthy appeal process in which Robinson claimed he had no idea what was going on, that he just rented out portions of the catacombs at the rate of about $260 a month. Only $260 a month to bribe a public official to look the other way while you grow cannabis in a national monument? By Humboldt standards, that's a steal.

Bob Marley

There is a stunning number of products for sale bearing the name of the immortal Bob, including green tea, earbuds (I own a pair) and, of course, weed. The Marley Natural brand launched last February, the result of a collaboration between dubiously-titled Privateer Holdings (Peter Thiel, the now-notorious Gawker litigation funder, is a backer) and the Marley progeny. Attaching the Marley name to such a blatantly capitalist enterprise drew controversy at the time.

Last week the company announced it will pony up to help clear the criminal records of people in Oregon convicted of minor cannabis-related crimes. The project is a collaboration with the Minority Cannabis Business Association, a fairly new organization aimed at promoting diversity in the equally new world of legal marijuana entrepreneurship. One of the ironies of the burgeoning industry is that due to the disproportionate arrest and prosecution rates, many people of color have been barred from opening dispensaries or other cannabis-related businesses. According to an article in USA Today, about 30 people across Oregon will qualify for expungement.

Bonafide social justice or callously motivated PR move? What would Bob say?

Skilled Nursing Facilities May Close

Rockport Healthcare Services, the management company for five of Humboldt County's six skilled nursing facilities, announced Aug. 25 that it has filed relocation notices for three sites: Pacific, Seaview, and Eureka Rehabilitation and Wellness Centers. The relocation notices, filed with the California Department of Public Health, are the first step in closing these facilities, which collectively contain 258 beds, and relocating their patients.

Stefan Friedman, spokesperson for Rockport, said in a statement that the company is continuing to work with community partners to "find a solution to [a] severe staffing crisis," but it is possible that after public health approves their relocation notices they will shut down the facilities.

That, said Area 1 Agency on Aging ombudsman Suzi Fregeau, would be "catastrophic."

Although many patients stay only briefly in skilled nursing facilities, receiving rehabilitation after leaving the hospital, the facilities are often the last stop for patients who cannot afford in-home healthcare professionals and need 24-hour care. Their vital role in the continuum of care was felt last year, when the facilities — five of which are owned by the same company, Brius Healthcare — stopped accepting patients. Hospital administrators, hospice workers and families all felt the pinch, and many North Coast residents had to go to facilities far away from Humboldt County. Fregeau said the potential closure would be even worse.

"It means that residents are going to be placed in facilities a minimum of 150 miles away," she said. "People are going to be dying in communities they've never lived in."

Last week, Rockport confirmed that the company has been unable to recruit qualified local nursing staff to meet the requirements of such facilities. California requires at least 3.2 hours of total nursing time per patient per day. The shortage of skilled medical staff is a countywide problem, affecting even the tiny eight-bed Jerold Phelps, in Garberville. Matt Rees, CEO of Southern Humboldt Community Healthcare District, confirmed that, even after raising wages, the facility has had trouble recruiting staff.

"When Humboldt State (University) shut their nursing program down, it really hurt our area," he said in a phone interview. "We need more nurses, more CNAs, more clinical lab scientists, just more certified people in the healthcare industry."

Rockport spent $5 million last year to bring in staff from outside the region, a practice it says is "not financially sustainable."

In its press release, the company said it "remain[s] hopeful that [it] can avoid these measures. ... This is a painful possibility for all involved. We will continue to meet with any and all partners to develop alternative resolutions as we simultaneously prepare for this scenario."

What those alternative resolutions may be — a community buy in, a nonprofit, a financial bailout — is unclear.

Suing Squires

The legal saga of trying to bring Eureka's most notorious landlord into compliance

By Kimberly Wear

Improvements have been made to the 833 H St. apartment complex owned by Floyd Squires, pictured here after earthquake damage in early 2010, but broken windows and other repairs remain to be done at the building that was the subject of a succesful nuissance lawsuit brought by neighbors. File photo

The apartment complex at 833 H St. in Eureka has seen better days. Nearly a dozen broken windows dot the walls of the two-story building and overgrown shrubs encase tendrils of blackberries that reach out toward the sidewalk.

Curtains fluttered behind the fractured panes on a recent afternoon. Some of the peeling blue window frames stood propped open with books, while others appeared boarded up from the inside.

The building is among others owned by Floyd and Betty Squires that are awaiting or have been undergoing repairs in recent months after a judge placed 26 of the couple's properties into what's known as a "receivership" in 2013.

One batch was signed off as completed in August, a small step forward in the city's quest to bring the properties into compliance with building codes.

The process is still ongoing nearly six years after the city first filed the lawsuit against the Squireses, claiming their conduct was akin to that of "slumlords." The filing itself was the culmination of a decades-long labyrinth of litigation between the two parties over conditions at the couple's 200 or so rental units within the city limits.

Put simply, the city didn't feel the Squireses could be trusted to undertake the repairs necessary to make their rental units safe and livable, so they asked a judge to step in.

The judge presiding over the case — Dale Reinholtsen — eventually appointed an overseer, known as a receiver, to inspect the properties and monitor the completion of needed repairs, ranging from simple tasks — such as installing smoke detectors and fixing broken windows — to more substantial overhauls, including replacing rotting floors and addressing structural deficiencies.

Brian Gerving, Eureka's public works director and chief building inspector, described the progress as "frustrating." So far, he said, Squires has missed all of his court-ordered deadlines.

Calling the city's petition for a receivership an "extreme remedy," Gerving said the city's hand was forced by a "pattern of violations" that had been going on for years without resolution.

"For whatever reason — willingness, ability, whatever the case — we haven't seen Squires take the necessary steps to cure violations at the properties," he said.

Squires, who declined to comment for this story with the exception of a few brief statements, sees it differently.

"We're proceeding to get everything signed off by the city," he said.

At a July court appearance in a separate but related case, the 70-year-old, who cut an almost grandfather-like figure on the stand in a sports jacket with his stark white hair and beard, characterized the receivership lawsuit as "senseless."

"It was like being hit in the head with a hammer," he said.

That testimony came during the jury trial of a trespassing and invasion of privacy lawsuit that Squires unsuccessfully brought against the receiver originally selected by the city.

The spinoff legal action was just one of many unusual twists and turns since the city filed the receivership case in January of 2011, alleging the Squireses had engaged in a long-standing pattern of maintaining "substandard and unsafe conditions" at their properties.

As one of Eureka's most prolific landlords in a city plagued with a shortage of low-income housing, Squires has developed a reputation for taking in tenants no one else will, including those with histories of evictions and bad credit. With Eureka's Housing First approach to dealing with homelessness putting pressure on existing housing stock — starting with the city's joint pledge with the county to get 30 homeless people into housing in 60 days — Squires should be a key player, an ally, in the city's housing push. Instead, Squires and the city remain at opposing counsel tables in a courtroom, with the city insisting many of his properties don't meet basic minimum standards to keep renters safe.

"Another point I've made many times," Gerving said, "is, yes, there is a segment of the population that needs to be housed and it's important to have options for that housing. However, that doesn't mean they should be forced to live in conditions that put them at risk."

The Squireses had amassed 77 code actions over an eight-year period and had accrued nearly $500,000 in citations, fines and special assessments by the time the lawsuit was filed.

Going property by property, the city outlined a long list of problems, ranging from pigeon and cockroach infestations to hazardous wiring, deteriorating walls and a lack of running water.

Reinholtsen appointed Mark Adams as a provisional receiver over the 26 properties in March of 2011. Squires immediately appealed the decision and posted a $50,000 "undertaking" to stay the ruling for the time being. His appeal was later dismissed as moot by an appellate court.

Another hearing took place before Reinholtsen in June of 2011, with 34 witnesses offering testimony. This time, the judge placed six of the properties that he deemed "a substantial endangerment" to residents and the public under receivership.

That, again, was short lived. Squires filed an appeal the day after the October 2011 order, which for a second time put the receivership on hold.

A four-week-long trial followed a year later.

In July of 2013 — more than two years after Eureka filed the lawsuit — Reinholtsen ruled violations at the properties did not pose extensive health and safety risks or rise to the level of public nuisance as the city had argued, but noted there was evidence of those issues in the past.

"Squires has presented evidence that many of the violations have been corrected," Reinholtsen wrote, citing the testimony of an expert witness who inspected the properties.

Gerving said that's one of the Squireses' practices: to employ a flurry of activity when the pressure is on.

But the flurry of activity wasn't quite enough to avoid the hammer. While Reinholtsen found the properties didn't pose immediate health and safety threats, he agreed with the city's argument that the Squireses' maintaining them in substandard conditions gave them an unfair advantage over other Eureka landlords that were in compliance with city and state codes.

Reinholtsen ordered the properties back under receivership, which is where they remain today. Squires' attorney Bradford Floyd described the ruling as a "loss" for the city.

"They got almost nothing that they wanted, that they were asking for," he said, adding he plans to file a motion for attorney fees at the conclusion of the case.

Attorney Krista MacNevin Jee of the Fullerton-based law firm Jones & Mayer, which is representing the city, called Floyd's assessment "inaccurate."

The now boarded up Blue Heron Motel, condemned in January of 2015, is one of 26 properties owned by Floyd Squires that a judge placed under receivership to address building code violations after years of litigation between the landlord and the city of Eureka. Submitted

"The bottom line is that a receiver was appointed to compel correction of the properties, and the receiver has thus far been ordered to be paid for by the Squireses," she said in an email.

The last bill for the receiver's services, according to records from an April court hearing, came in at $20,000.

The Squires receivership case stands out for a number of reasons, including the number of properties involved and the extended timeline, according to Jee, whose firm specializes in receiverships and unfair business practices statutes.

But perhaps the biggest anomaly is the role the Squireses have played in the process.

Generally, court-appointed receivers are given full control over the properties. They are granted the ability to collect rent and take out short-term loans to pay for ordered repairs. They come in and gets the work done, with the owners completely cut out of the arrangement.

"Normally, that's the advantage of a receiver," Jee said.

In this case, the Squireses continue to operate as landlords under what Jee described as a "hybrid system" set up by the judge. While the receiver, former Humboldt County Planning Commissioner Jeff Smith, outlines the course of work needed at each site, the couple oversees the repairs, including picking up permits and requesting inspections.

That, Jee said, has led to delays at every turn.

Floyd paints a different picture, saying the system has worked out well and repairs are on track to have most of the residential units done by the end of August.

> "What was happening was they were saying the light was red and we were saying the lights were green."
> — Bradford Floyd

Smith, who was the Squireses' choice for the receivership position, meets privately with Reinholtsen to discuss the progress.

"Jeff has done a great job at it and gone through property by property," Floyd said.

He described Smith's role as more of a referee, saying the Squireses and the city often disagree on the scope of work that needs to be done.

"What was happening was they were saying the light was red and we were saying the lights were green," Floyd said.

Long before the case of City of Eureka vs. Floyd Squires made its way into Reinholtsen's courtroom, the two sides had been engaged in an escalating standoff over code violations dating back to the mid-1980s, a few years after Squires said he acquired his first property in Eureka.

That, according to his testimony at the trespassing trial, was in 1978, when President Jimmy Carter was in the White House and Grease was the top grossing movie of the year. Other property purchases followed and the troubles between him and the city of Eureka surfaced soon afterward, according to court documents.

Over the ensuring years, Squires accrued a litany of citations from the building department — so many that the Squireses now have their own storage section in city hall, mainly due to the ongoing receivership case, Gerving said.

Things had reached a sort of febrile pitch by late 2010 when Squires filed a lawsuit alleging that he and his wife, Betty, were being unfairly targeted by the city and singled out "from all other property owners in this community ... for the specific purpose of harassing, vexing, annoying and/or harming [them]."

The court ruled against Squires and the city was eventually awarded attorney fees. Around the same time, city officials were serving inspection warrants on the Squireses' rental units. The receivership case followed a few months later.

During the trespassing trial, Squires called the receivership case an act of "retaliation" for the legal action he brought against Eureka and several officials, including Gerving.

"Prior to 2010, we encountered a lot of problems with the city getting involved in some of our tenant disputes at the time, so we filed the harassment case in 2010," Squires said.

While the Squireses are not the city's largest landlord, Gerving said the couple stands out in the sheer number of violations and lack of responsiveness to notices and fines. Others own a similar amount of property but don't carry the same enforcement baggage.

The dozens of files documenting code and safety violations at Squires owned buildings could cover a small conference table with piles of paper stacked inches high, he said.

The only titleholders that match the Squireses for want of remedial action are foreclosed properties under the control of banks, Gerving said.

"The city filed this case because we were concerned at the number and severity of violations at the subject properties and what we see, five and a half years later, is that in many ways we're at the same spot as the day we filed and that's concerning because there are safety issues present," Gerving said.

Even before Eureka sought to wrest away control of his properties, Squires had seen his fair share of time in court.

Humboldt County records show more than 400 cases bearing his name, including small claims actions by tenants and a long list of his eviction proceedings, constituting a paper trail that dates back decades.

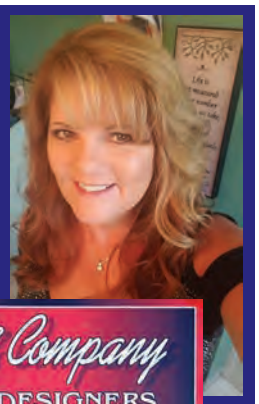

Over time he's sued and been sued, with many of the voluminous files centered on the Eureka properties that Squires owns with his wife Betty.

Among those was a nuisance case in 2011 brought by neighbors of 833 H St., who said they feared for their safety and had lost value in the historic homes they worked hard to restore due to the pervasive problems at Squires' apartments.

The building, according to their lawsuit, attracted "drug users and dealers, transients, disruptive, loud and inebriated person, criminals, pitbulls, and other undesirable traffic in to the neighborhood."

A judge collectively awarded the neighbors more than $100,000 for emotional distress and economic damages in 2014, an award that was eventually settled with Squires' insurance company, the prestigious Lloyds of London.

Squires has also had other financial problems related to his properties, including currently owing nearly $2 million in defaulted property taxes, according to county records.

Humboldt County Treasurer-Tax Collector John Bartholomew said his office is "very familiar" with the Squireses. Over the years, a number of his properties have gone into default, with some moving close to the final stage of being auctioned off before the delinquent bills are paid.

"As a rule, they come in and pay it off at some point prior to being sold," Bartholomew said.

Squires does have some properties over the five-year mark that would normally trigger a sale, but that's been put on hold due to the ongoing litigation, Bartholomew said, adding that is the county's general rule under such circumstances.

"As far as I'm aware," he added, "Mr. Squires has never let one of his properties be auctioned."

So where does the case go from here?

The stucco building at 833 H St., the site of 50 police calls in the last year, now stands among the last of the 26 properties slated for repair under a prioritized work schedule that started with the simplest projects before progressing to the most complex.

Also included on the final list is the now boarded up Blue Heron Motel, where downtrodden residents once lived in conditions an official described as "subhuman," as well as the historic Lloyd Building on Fifth Street, which has been the subject of litigation since 2006 over a lack of seismic retrofitting.

Built in 1915, the unreinforced masonry building suffered damage in the January 2010 earthquake, and officials argue it is a threat to public safety.

Depending on which side you talk to, the repairs are either caught in gridlock or moving toward the finish line.

With the hardest work still ahead, the city asked the court to "at long last" place the final renovations solely in Smith's hands.

"It isn't a matter of the repairs themselves taking too long, it's that at every step of the process it's been taking too long," Jee told the judge. "The question is why is it taking so long?"

Floyd suggested Smith be given the discretion to take over, but only if he sees a need.

There is one thing city officials and Floyd appear to agree on: It didn't have be this way. Their perspectives on why, however, are as opposite as night and day.

"A lot of the violations, while some of them are very concerning to us because of the threat they pose, many of them are not difficult to deal with," Gerving said. "Any reasonable person, acting with a reasonable level of diligence, would be able to facilitate these repairs without any problem."

"This litigation process can't be pleasant for anybody," he added. "It's certainly not how I would prefer to spend my time. It would have been quicker, cheaper and easily less stressful for everyone involved for them to have fixed the violations long ago."

A checklist of complete projects from the last round of repairs rang up at nearly $70,000, according to inspection status reports.

Floyd estimated the city has accrued $1 million in outside legal costs in the suit against his client, money that he says would have been better spent assisting the Squireses in getting the buildings repaired rather than "being an impediment."

"They're trying to run the Squireses out of town. They're trying to break the Squireses' back. That was the whole purpose of this lawsuit," Floyd said. "The city's the one that started the fight."

"They were, as far as I'm concerned, very shortsighted," Floyd said.

(The city had not provided a requested tally of the case's legal bill by deadline.)

Shortly before the Journal went to press, Reinholtsen denied the city's motion for Smith to take control.

Jee said Squires has come up with his fair share of reasons over the years for why work can't be completed in a timely manner: He'll say he's trying. That he's doing his best. That he can't get access to a tenant's apartment.

"The city's been around long enough to hear them all," she said. ●

The Fruit of Your Labor

Blackberry picking and cocktails

By Nora Mounce

For nutrition alone, the call to capture the summer windfall of blackberries is strong. Blackberries are frequently hailed as a "superfood," a media term which simply means blackberries are really, really good for you. That same deep purple color permanently stained on our childhood memories is proof that blackberries have some of the highest antioxidant levels around. As they also provide a hearty shot of vitamin C and fiber, ramping up your blackberry intake is a smart move for preventative care and digestion.

Beyond their superstar health status, the dark-hued beauties are free — if you consider a few hours in the sunshine more pleasure than labor. But far too often summer passes by with purple-tinged guilt for all the forgotten blackberries surrounding our homes, roads and schools. This food-gleaning tragedy goes unchecked because, childhood nostalgia aside, harvesting blackberries can be a serious pain in the bum. This summer, prickly vines be damned, I was determined to harvest a bounty of the super-healthy, super-free food. After setting forth, here are my two blackberry picking mantras to pass on to you: "Fail to prepare, prepare to fail," and, "Location, location, location."

First, understand that you're going to pick berries. Don't try to multitask this activity with walking the dog or getting a tan — some form of failure will be inevitable. Your dress code should be nothing less than lightweight pants and a long-sleeve shirt, no matter the temperature, so early morning picking is ideal. A hat, shades, sunscreen and a light-duty pair of cotton gardening gloves are good accessories, though I find the best strategy is to pluck berries with bare hands and treat yourself later with a heavy application of your fanciest hand cream or coconut oil. The few itchy scratches you picked up will fade by the following day.

Additional accessories for more ambitious berry harvesters include medium-sized planks for making paths deep into the heart of berry-laden bushes and proper containers for collecting the fruit. I cannot overstate how worthwhile it is to craft a few berry-picking rigs before setting out. My favorite is a cardboard box lid, but a plastic milk jug works too — get creative. Punch two holes in each side of your container and string yarn or twine through each hole, tying them off, and making a lanyard of sorts. When you're shoulder-deep inside a prickly bush and find a particularly berry heavy branch, you'll high-five yourself for tying that container around your neck, rather than struggling to go backward with every handful.

Back to that other mantra — location! Everyone knows that blackberries on your property either need to be painstakingly cut back or destroyed. The vinous bush is incredibly prolific and only total extermination via shovel will keep the fruit-bearing weed from coming back. So the ideal location? Your neighbor's yard, of course! As soon as you start looking, you'll realize blackberry bushes are everywhere. Always be sure to ask nicely. Many folks avoid side of the road opportunities but I think a healthy rinse is reasonable. Avoid the side of highways for safety reasons. Surveying locals, I received reports of treasure troves on Freshwater Road, along the Hammond Trail, and in Korbel and Maple Creek. Personally, I gathered enough for a simple yet elegant blackberry crisp at the Arcata Marsh in a mere hour's time. A berry crisp is the classic, no-fuss way to guarantee your berries will get eaten, but in the spirit of balancing both mind and body, whip up the cocktail recipe below for a true celebration of summer and Humboldt County's bounty.

Blackberry Basil Gin Fizz

This recipe is adapted from Smitten Kitchen. Make the syrup first — adding a spoonful of it to club soda makes a fine daytime refresher.

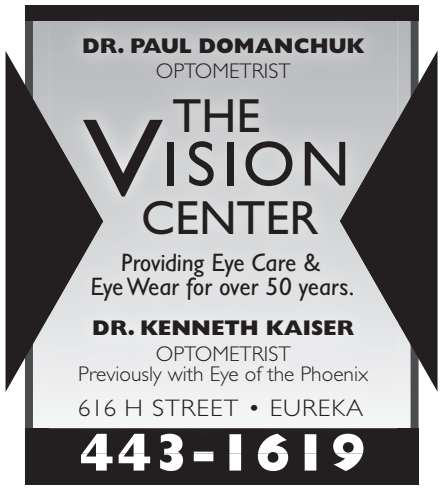

For the basil simple syrup:
- 1 cup water
- 1 cup sugar
- 15 large basil leaves

For two tall drinks:
- ¼ cup (heaping) fresh blackberries
- 1 ½ tablespoons sugar
- 2 ½ shots gin (Henderson's highly recommended)
- ¼ cup fresh lime juice (roughly 1 large lime)
- 1 Tablespoon basil simple syrup
- Club soda
- 2 sprigs sweet basil

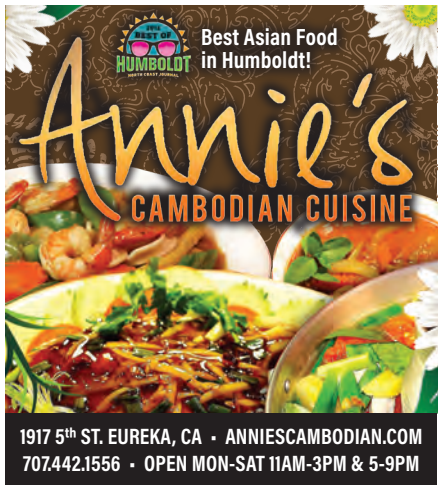

Combine the sugar and water in a small pot and bring to boil, stirring until all sugar is dissolved. Remove it from the heat and add basil leaves. Cover the pot and let it steep at least 30 minutes, longer for more basil flavor. Strain the syrup through a sieve and refrigerate.

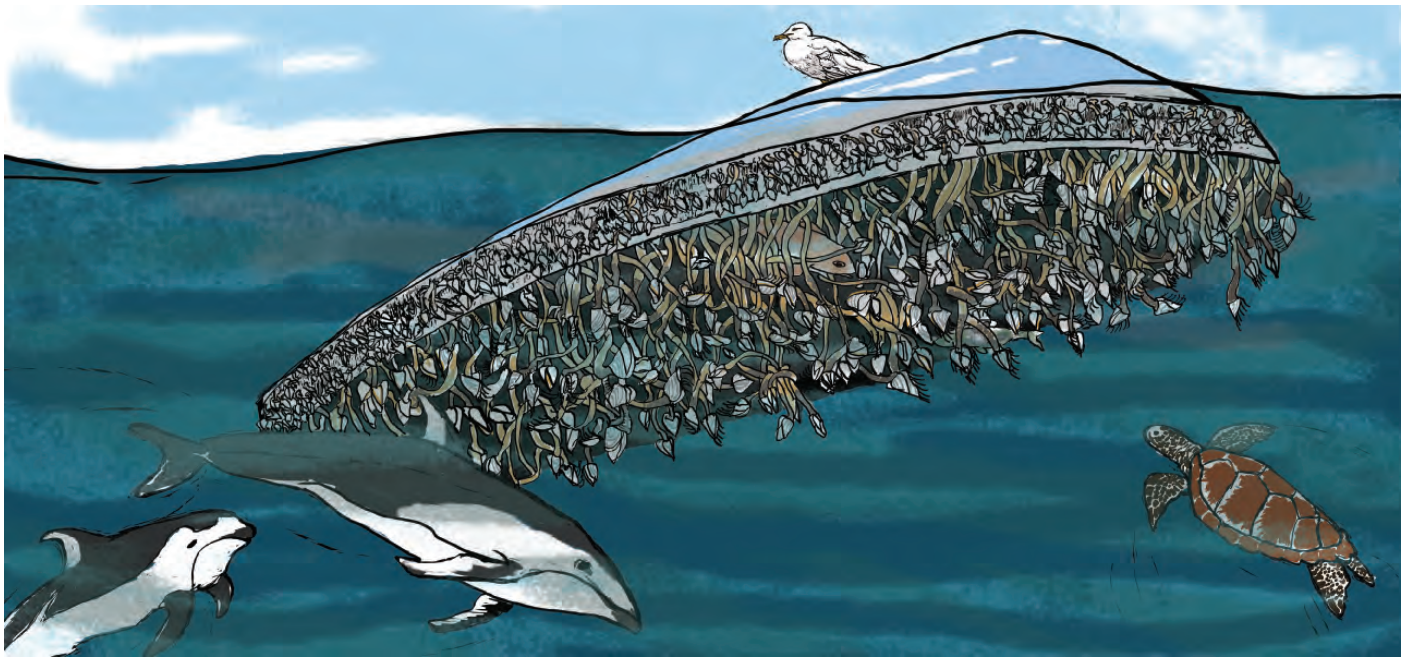

Purée the blackberries and sugar in a blender. Strain the purée through a fine-mesh sieve (be sure to scrape underside of the sieve where the rich mash will build up). Compost the seeds. Divide the purée, gin and lime juice equally into two tall glasses, stirring vigorously to combine. Add 2-3 ice cubes and top each a with a generous splash of club soda. Give them another gentle stir and garnish with sprigs of basil and a few berries. Share with a friend worthy of all your hard work. ●

24-hour Arty People

Photographs at F Street Foto Gallery

This solstice, 24 Eureka photographers came together to document the day's passage for 24 Hours, 24 Photographers. Humboldt State University photojournalism professor (and freelance photographer for the Journal) Mark Larson, who organized the project, invited each photographer to shoot during a prearranged hour-long time slot. Any type of film, digital camera, and/or lighting was permissible but all pictures had to be shot within Eureka city limits.

To find participants, Larson drew on his extensive network of contacts in the community. He assembled a diverse group of shutterbugs ranging from students to photojournalists to commercial specialists and fine arts professionals. He took a hands-off approach for the most part, occasionally aiding the process by offering gnomic words of encouragement. "'Let the photograph come to you,' that was always Mark's advice," Brandi Easter affirmed.

"As photojournalists, we're trained to overcome our natural shyness and approach strangers," Larson noted. "But not everyone in this exhibition is a photojournalist. Some were shy about going up to strangers; others found themselves intrigued by the experience." Some exhibitors produced works of classic street photography; others interpreted Larson's brief in a more expansive way, making still lives, landscapes and portraits that sought to summarize the Eurekan zeitgeist.

Larson photographed between 6 and 7 a.m. He asked himself: What events would be going on in the city at that hour? "My original plan was to show up at the Eureka Rescue Mission at 6 a.m., when the homeless people get booted out onto the streets. But I censored myself from taking the pictures that I planned. This was in part because I was dealing with my own internal shyness. And in part it was because once I got there, I didn't feel like I wanted to intrude onto some unfortunate person's life at that particular moment. But then I looked across Halvorsen Park and the photo found me — it was the camp of a sleeping homeless person with the Carson Mansion visible in the background."

Later that morning, Dana Utman adopted a more directed approach. He brought his camera to the Sequoia Park Zoo between 10 and 11 a.m. with a goal in mind: "I wanted to see if I could capture animals and children together." He chose an hour when he knew that the animals would be astir. Zoo staff helped out by feeding the otters, drawing both people and animals to the place he wanted to photograph.

Zoo photos make many of us reflexively hearken back to The Animals, Garry Winogrand's 1969 zoo collection described by photo historian John Szarkowski as, "even if true ... a grotesquery." While that photographer's viewfinder often seemed to scorch what it framed, Utman's image is serene. The picture plane is split by the air-water divide. Above and below the water line, a triangulating child-otter-child composition generates gravitas. An otter rears up at the triangle's apex, its teeth shining in the sun. Down below, little kids viewed through curving plexiglass laugh in what appears to be a pellucid, moss-green, underwater world.

For Utman, the shoot went according to plan. But for other photographers, the hour turned into an exercise in crisis management. "What I thought I was going to shoot didn't work out at all," Monica Topping remarked. She had chosen her 6 p.m. time slot with twilight effects in mind but failed to reckon with light conditions on the longest day of the year at 40.8021 degrees north latitude. "It was like midday light. I had wanted to shoot from the roof of the Eureka Theater, but then I realized that up there I was eye level with every single power line in the city." Undaunted, Topping at first tried "getting creative with some pigeons up inside of rusty I-beams," but ended up dashing across the city on a whim instead. She found herself in the leafy confines of Sequoia Park with fewer than 20 minutes to spare, in search of an antidote to urban grit. The clock was ticking but Topping spied "one single bright red ripe thimbleberry" overhead. Taking the right picture turned out easy in the end.

Larson cited as inspiration the popular "Day in the Life" photography series, as well as the "Project 24" photo shoot staged more recently in San Francisco. Going back farther, the work of midcentury street photographer Henri Cartier-Bresson has been important to him. So has Cartier-Bresson's influential notion of the "decisive moment" in photography. As the French photojournalist explained to an interviewer in 1957: "There is a creative fraction of a second when you are taking a picture. Your eye must see a composition or an expression that life itself offers you, and you must know with intuition when to click the camera. That is the moment when the photographer is creative. ... The moment! Once you miss it, it is gone forever."

While many of these photographs testify to the enduring influence of Cartier-Bresson's ideal, the stories behind them — made legible with extended captions — clarify just how much the definition of "decisive moment" has been changed by digital technology. Contemporary photographers have a different relationship to plurality and perhaps to time itself.

When Easter shot a moody nocturne sequence of green streetlights at the intersection of Fourth and I streets between 3 and 4 a.m., she "was surprised by the way that the appearance of the streetlights changed when I closed the F-stop. As the aperture got smaller, the streetlights started to elongate and look like stars. People who saw the photographs asked me if I had added some kind of star effect (in post-production). I have no idea how it works out in terms of the physics or the optics. But the star effect was interesting and real. It ended up adding to the sense of mystery and quiet that the street possessed at that hour."

"I got to use my favorite lens," Topping said. "It's called the Lensbaby. It's manual focus. That's part of the reason why shooting with it is a challenge; the camera isn't finding that sweet spot for me. And this lens creates a lot of blur. It has a very shallow depth of field, so it registers very small, precise effects. I couldn't tell from looking at the tiny pic in the camera monitor whether the pictures were working out, or not. Thankfully, with digital you just shoot 100 and you get the shot."

Adrenaline on Wheels

Burning rubber at the Samoa Drag Strip

By Michael Joyce
getout@northcoastjournal.com

My hands squeeze tight on the wheel. Other parts of my anatomy are following suit. Tunnel vision has limited my focus to a half-mile strip of blackened concrete running north into the Samoa dunes. The smell is a funky mix of sea air and car exhaust. My race face is a quivering attempt at motorized manliness, fueled by tepid testosterone and near-toxic levels of adrenaline.

The guy I plan to race has informed me that his car is a '94 Mustang with a 5.0 V-8. When asked about mine, I find myself looking for the owner's manual and remembering I've been asked to move all the crap out of my car so nothing can "become a projectile." Life without a pine tree freshener and St. Christopher is lonely and I find myself jonesing for a George Plimpton bobble head.

I had wanted to race against Dale Lindstrom, de facto patriarch of the Samoa Dragstrip, but sciatica has him in the pits nursing his back and a 1929 Ford Roadster. Dave can tell you about growing up in the '30s just a half mile up the road, "shooting rabbits just over there," and delivering the Times-Standard to Navy seamen when this was a World War II blimp base. (The Japanese had attacked a tanker off Cape Mendocino just two weeks after Pearl Harbor, so blimps started patrolling the North Coast.)

The blimp base closed in 1945 and by 1952 local car clubs (most notably The Blockbusters) began racing on the airstrip. The car clubs merged to form the Humboldt Timing Association, holding organized races from spring to fall. It held its first National Hot Rod Association (NHRA) sanctioned race on Nov. 21, 1954. Eventually drivers grew tired of interrupting their races so planes could land so, in 1960, with the help of Eureka-based Mercer-Fraser Company, the group built the current strip about 100 yards away. The Samoa Dragstrip (400 New Navy Base Road) — along with the Redding Dragstrip — is among the oldest, continuously running drag strips in the country.

"The air here is perfect for racing," says Jerry Brazil, who first raced out at Samoa in 1955 with a modified Ford Model A. "When you factor the altitude, temperature and humidity out here, you can get a corrected altitude below sea level. So the air is denser. The denser the air, the more that goes through the motor, and the faster you go!" Brazil would know. He's built nearly all the cars he's raced. His personal best over a quarter-mile (the standard drag racing distance) is 5.42 seconds and 264 miles per hour at Sears Point.

"People wonder why we would only want to drive for a few seconds," says Danny Wright, president of the Samoa Dragstrip for the past 13 years (and who admits a fetish for '57 Chevys). "It's about the cars, the adrenaline, and the competition."

And it's that competitive spirit that has gotten the Eureka Police Department (EPD) involved with the racers twice in the drag strip's 64-year history. First, in the 1950s, when street racing first came into fashion. Back then Elk River Road was a popular spot and there were some deaths. The EPD encouraged the speedsters to move their races out to the Samoa track and, for the most part, they did. The second time was the early 2000s when the Fast and the Furious movies sparked a national street racing renaissance, often with deadly results, and police departments across the country again turned to drag strips. The EPD would even show up with patrol cars and motorcycles to challenge the street racers.

While it may be true that most drag racers can build an engine, are men (though women like NHRA Top Fuel racer Hillary Will, of Fortuna, are gaining ground) and have speed on their minds and grease under their nails, there is another commonality they are quite proud of: family.

"Racing is addictive and family-oriented," says Brazil, whose wife of 55 years, Betty, has helped him build most of his engines. "I raced my first car with Betty's brother and now my granddaughter (Kaycee Mela) is doing 172 miles per hour."

"I'm a car guy but I like watching my family race even more," says Wright, who helped start the Junior Dragster program for 8 to 17-year-olds in 1996. "My son is still racing at age 30 and was the very first junior dragster to go down this track when he was 8 years old. To watch him brought me more joy than when I used to race. I couldn't break the 13-second barrier but together we built him a 10-second car."

As for me, I didn't even come close to breaking 18 seconds in my quarter mile during the "everyone welcome" Street Legal Race. (You can do it, too, if you're a registered driver with a safe car and working brakes.) My family sedan — which I'm informed has a "2-liter, inline 4-cylinder engine with 155 horses under the hood" — made its way down the track at a speed that probably would have only alarmed my grandmother or the Eureka Police Department. Both St. Christopher and George Plimpton can breathe a sigh of relief. ●

The final races of the 2016 Samoa Dragstrip season will be Sept. 10 and 11. Saturday, Sept. 10 will be diesel races and on Sunday the track will be hosting the NHRA California State Championships for the first time in its history.

Laura Cortese and the Dance Cards rock post-folk in the Arcata Playhouse at 8 p.m. on Saturday, Sept. 2. Courtesy of the artists

In my brief musical career, I've always been a part of the rhythm section, far from "frontman" status. Partly due to my lack of charisma and over-active sweat glands, I've never had a problem with this. Occasionally I'll feign that I'm giving the lead a run for his or her money, but that's just to remind people not to fuck with the bass and respect the rhythm section. I've been blessed with the sonic smooth sailing that comes of playing with frontpeople without real egos. In the end, unless you're backing up a solo musician, you're part of a band. If you're in essence a solo musician but want to give your red hot band marquee status, you can go the route of Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band — "you're here for my songs but my band kicks ass." Neil Young and Crazy Horse. Joe Strummer and the Mescaleros. Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers.

You can start out with your name and add the band name later. Harder to pull off — and more douchey — is tacking your name onto your band name later for marketing/ego purposes, or to remind the band nobody cares about them. Start as Radiohead? Stick with it. Don't change to Thom Yorke and Radiohead midstream. It wouldn't have been fair to Beatles fans to have to adjust to either Paul and The Beatles or John and The Beatles, and it sure as shit wouldn't have been fair to Georgie or Ringo.

Friday

For those of you in the Eel River Valley who want to get your dance on, head over to the Bear River Casino and Hotel for a free show from hardworking local band Dr. Squid, working the hits from multiple decades for your pleasure around 9 p.m. Dancing and swaying is possible in Arcata with local bands Strix Vega and The Trouble at Humboldt Brews. The Trouble — barroom alt-country rockers — will hopefully pull off a few songs from their recent release of Love Rules the World ("Papermoon" is one of my favorites) while fellow locals and lunar dirge rockers Strix Vega (with me as its sweaty bassist) follow up with songs from its yet-to-be released third album. A 9:30 p.m. start time for this $5 local show.

Saturday

It's Arts Alive! in Eureka tonight, which means lots of free music and wine at select Old Town businesses. In the event you missed Chris Parreira in The Trouble last night, you can catch him at The Morris Graves with No Pardon. This one kicks off around 6 p.m. and is free. Fresh off its exclusive Neil Young set at the Logger Bar recently, Wild Otis performs originals tonight, and if you beg — and perhaps tip — maybe a cover of Ol' Shakey. Show up at 8 p.m. to hear 'em start at Redwood Curtain Brewery for this free show. Also at 8 p.m., you'll find some Berklee College of Music grads at the Arcata Playhouse. David of the Playhouse sent a press release on Laura Cortese and the Dance Cards who "can start as a string band, and morph into a string quartet, female a cappella group, or indie band." Sounds pretty cool, and nice to hear about "post-folk that seriously rocks," isn't afraid to venture around and dip toes in different genres. Bay Area native Cortese headed out to Berklee (not Berkeley) to study violin and met some of the collaborators you'll hear tonight. She's shared the stage with Band of Horses (weren't they that MySpace band from a while back?), Pete Seeger and Michael Franti (more below). On a side note, I've always wondered what the difference is between a violin and a fiddle. Is it a style of playing? Can one go to Berklee to study the fiddle or just violin? Can you fiddle in an orchestra and play violin in a hillbilly jug band? Are you a fiddler if you have fewer than 32 teeth in your mouth? Why is violin not also a verb? I digress. Hear some excellent violin tonight for $15. According to Ian of the Alibi, tonight is the 13th Songwriter Circle of Death (a.k.a. Lucky 13), in which songwriters take turns hawking you their musical wares. At 11 p.m. hear from solo-punk bassist TheBoredAgain, corn-fed kombucha-swillin' bad ass Keil La Chinga (of Que La Chinga fame) and The Lucky Loser Show. Leave the circle of life to others; this circle of death is just $3.

Sunday

You can hear from another former Chinga down in Redway at the eighth annual SoHum Beer Fest & Barbecue Smoke Off at The Mateel Community Center. No one's exactly sure what ever happened to Bret La Chinga but some say his spirit lives on in the physical form of the frontman of Cliff Dallas & The Death Valley Troubadours, who are heading up tonight's entertainment with Mojave-desert rock filtered through the coastal breeze and redwood trees. Also on tonight's bill are The Funnicators, who play some soul classics and keep it real with tunes from James Brown, Otis Redding and Wilson Pickett, to name a few. This event gets going around 4 p.m. and lasts until 8 p.m. with $15 getting you barbecue and music. Though I'm not too familiar with Michael Franti & Spearhead, I've heard the tunes around town and I know the band has a big following in Humboldt. I also know that their uplifting positivity and music imbued with hope has always made me feel like a cynical asshole. "I make music for one reason ... I care about people and I care about the planet," says Franti. I'll give him credit for wearing his heart on his sleeve and fighting the good fight using music to try to push the world in a more humane and positive direction. It sounds exhausting. They'll be in town tonight at the Van Duzer Theater on HSU's campus tonight in support of their recently released ninth album Soulrocker. The album debuted at No. 1 on the iTunes Alternative album chart, as well as No. 5 on Billboard's Rock Album chart, so it appears the message of unity is resonating. The album is lined with electronic music supporting Franti's guitar and songcraft. Having learned that he's a fan of Kraftwerk, I may need to go dust off Trans-Europe Express. Tickets are $66, $35 for HSU students, with an 8 p.m. show time.

Monday

Today is the 31st Annual I-Block Party on said street in Arcata (between 11th and 10th) celebrating the sisterhood of Arcata, U.S.A. and Camoapa, Nicaragua. The free musical jams being provided on the Los Bagels stage starting around noon today by The Latin Peppers, SambAmore, Lizzy and the Moonbeams, and Timbata. Bring the kids out and enjoy the good food, music and cultural solidarity, all while making Arcata great again!

Tuesday

I've always appreciated how metal bands make it pretty easy for us to recognize their genre just by looking at their names. If it has "crush," "death," "chaos," "infinite sorrow," "slaughter," "slay," "gnash," "doom," "destructo" or something in Latin and/or some depressing malady of the flesh, you know you're in for a teeth-gnashing good time. With that in mind, upsidedowncross presents a metal night at The Jam in Arcata around 10 p.m. with Dispirit (Oakland black/doom metal), Black Fucking Cancer (pure black metal aural hell from San Francisco) and Zelosis (black metal from Whitethorn). On a side note, I hope said bands take my observations with the humor they are offered in, as I get the feeling any member of any of these bands could brutally extinguish the milquetoast flame that is alight in my frail and child-like body. $10 tonight. Darkness, fear thee not.

Wednesday

Local songsmithstress Joanne Rand headlines an intimate concert as part of The Crib House Concert Series in Arcata around 7 p.m. Joining her tonight is frequent collaborator Rob Diggins on the violin (fiddle?) and they welcome Mare Wakefield and her piano-playing husband Nomad out from Nashville to share the bill tonight. Curious where this intimate and secret show is being held? Drop a line to crib1251@gmail.com for info. I can tell you that there's a $10-25 sliding scale to get in, and I've got a feeling it'll be worth it. ●

Full show listings in the Journal's Music and More grid, the Calendar and online. Bands and promoters, send your gig info, preferably with a high-res photo or two, to music@northcoastjournal.com.

Andy Powell is a congenital music lover and hosts The Night Show on KWPT 100.3 FM weeknights at 6 p.m. His metal band name would be Rancid Flesh Lobotomy.

Pride and Joy

Most Pride parades commemorate the Stonewall uprising in June, but September (when students return) is our time to shine. Back in my day (popping teeth in mouth), it was half an afternoon with four or five speakers and one sister with a guitar singing protest songs. We waved tiny rainbow flags and went home. That was our Pride and we liked it.

Today's Humboldt Pride celebration is a full week of events, with a parade, an all-day festival with multiple stages, booths, performers and music, and a sweat-drenching after party that goes way past my bedtime.

Start off Vogue-ing at the Humboldt Pride Kick-off with Caravan of GLAM on Saturday, Sept. 3 at 9 p.m. at Blue Lake Casino ($25, $15 advance; $10 after 11 p.m. dance party only). Replenish at the Pancake Agenda Does Mack Town breakfast/social on Monday, Sept. 5 from 8 a.m. at Grace Good Shepherd Church ($10 adults suggested donation, $5 for children and seniors, free for kids 4 and under). Slept in? Hit the Brown Bag Picnic at noon the same day at Carson Park (free).

Catch foul balls at the OUTfielders Pride Week Softball Game, Sept. 7 at 7:45 p.m. at Hartman Field (free) and follow up the next day at the Pride & Pie Mixer on Sept. 8 from 5 to 8 p.m. at Slice of Humboldt Pie (free entry). Then get down at the Humboldt Pride Warm Up Party on Friday, Sept. 9 at 9 p.m. at the Pearl Lounge (free). Hit the parade through Old Town Eureka on Saturday, Sept. 10 at 11:30 a.m. (free), winding up at the Humboldt Pride Festival from noon to 5 p.m. at Halvorsen Park (free). Not ready to go home? Stay out at the Pride After Party that night starting at 7 p.m. (all ages) at the Jam, with a 21 and up celebration at 9 p.m. (price TBA).

Cars, Cars, Cars

Car enthusiasts, this week is guaranteed to get your motors running. From tricked out muscle cars to elegant vintage autos, Humboldt is gearing up to be a hot rod haven.

On Saturday, Sept. 3, the Clarke Historical Museum holds the grand opening of its Cars, Culture and Humboldt County in the 1950s exhibit during Arts Alive! at 6 p.m. (free). The show peeks under the hood to examine the impact cars had on Humboldt County life in the 1950s. Saturday's opening features rockin' tunes by Lizzy and the Moonbeams and tasty samples from Beer Kissed.

The following day, some very classy cars are rolling into picturesque Ferndale. The Victorian town welcomes the inaugural Ferndale Concours on Main on Sunday, Sept. 4 (free). The storied Concours d'Elegance event is a chance for the public to see exquisite auto craftsmanship — vintage cars in showroom condition — on display. Ferndale has a green light from the Sports Car Club of America to allow judging right on Main Street instead of the usual lawn. Organizers expect 100 vehicles and judging starts at 10 a.m. with trophy presentations at 2 p.m. Jeeves, get the car.

Both events should get you primed for Cruz'n Eureka, the annual fundraiser for the Boys and Girls Club of the Redwoods. It revs up Sept. 8 with a Eureka Theater showing of Bullitt and runs through Sept. 10 with a barbecue, cruise, show and shine and street-legal racing.

Genre Blind

Don't Breathe and Mechanic: Resurrection

By John J. Bennett

Reviews

DON'T BREATHE. Director Fede Alvarez weathered the gaze of my red, watery eye when he remade Evil Dead (2013), surpassing my low expectations with skill, imagination and reverence for the source material. I wouldn't have called myself a horror fan then (I've since come to terms), but Alvarez and his talented young cast overcame my resistance to conventions I had unfairly ascribed to most contemporary examples of the genre. Evil Dead did indeed contain cartoonish graphic violence and an incalculable volume of blood. What it helped me realize, though, was that those elements, so frequently mishandled and offered up only to shock, can actually serve a story. Evil Dead's hideousness escalated and elevated the tone of the piece, taking the lo-fi carnage of the original and turning it up to 11 in surround sound. Moreover, it showed how horror movies are a proving ground for writers and directors with genuine talent and a point of view. Because the stakes are low (small budgets, minimal studio scrutiny, a better-than-middling shot at profitability), horror offers freedom to move, challenge and experiment. It's OK to spend a day on an elaborate tracking shot, a crazy lighting design or a complicated stunt when nobody has to pay a movie star's asinine salary. Alvarez impressed me then as one of those talented artists with a point of view. Don't Breathe goes a long way toward proving I was right.

Some (like awards show voters) turn their noses up at "genre" pictures, lumping them based on subject/content rather than on quality or technique. It's critical laziness that's passed over some brilliant cinematic achievements, dismissing them as — what exactly? Too workmanlike? Too accessible? Too focused on storytelling? I've been guilty of it and have overlooked some winners. Don't Breathe is decidedly part of the horror canon but it occupies a different part of the spectrum from Evil Dead or most modern examples.

Rocky (Jane Levy, Evil Dead) feels trapped in a city that is returning to the Earth. Detroit is actively rotting around her. Her dad left years ago and her taunting mom drinks and keeps the company of dudes with Nazi tattoos. Rocky is her little sister's primary caregiver, which provides a glimmer of hope and a sense of urgency: They need to leave. In come Rocky's low-rent, fake-gangster boyfriend Money (Daniel Zovatto) and the tragically enamored Alex (Dylan Minnette). With the unwitting assistance of Alex's security-guard father, the three stage careful burglaries. Alex, the cooler head, takes charge of planning and execution, ensuring that the take never risks serious felony charges. When Money catches wind of an old guy sitting on a stack of cash in a desolate neighborhood, cooler heads do not prevail. Soon the three are breaking into a blind Gulf War veteran's house with him in it — a far more daunting task than expected.

Some moments in Don't Breathe pivot on shock, on things jumping into frame. But these are punctuation marks rather than text; Alvarez cultivates atmosphere and allows the story to breathe and expand within it for a delicious, palpable discomfort that is only heightened when, say, a Rottweiler appears and we jump out of our seats. So yes, this is a genre movie. More to the point, it is a very good movie. It abstains from horrific gore and lazy tricks, using original, intentional techniques, visual and narrative, in their place. And in so doing, it puts most modern movies, much less horror movies, to shame. R. 88M. BROADWAY, MILL CREEK.

MECHANIC: RESURRECTION. Jason Statham used to be my favorite action star, with his heavy hands, weird charisma and equal facility with jokes and more conventional weapons. It was all too good to be true because, lately, he only appears in nonsensical stuff like this.

Arthur Bishop (Statham) is ostensibly retired (following the events of The Mechanic, a circa 2011 remake that was saved by the proficient direction of Simon West and considerable screen presence of Ben Foster). But his nemesis Crain (Sam Hazeldine) effortlessly tracks him to his secret Thailand hiding spot (how's not important, apparently), plants a damsel in distress (Jessica Alba) and gets the two to fall in love (instantly! Kismet is real!). At which point Bishop is willing to kill everybody remorselessly. He's tasked with assassinating three international criminals (including Tommy Lee Jones, who probably got a sweet vacation out of the deal) who, we learn in the least surprising surprise maybe ever, represent Crain's main competition in the international arms trade. It's even stupider than my synopsis, and every line is laden with ridiculous exposition.

I hoped for a big, stupid, fun action movie. All I got was stupid. R. 99M. BROADWAY.

You should also be aware that the lien being auctioned off may be a junior lien. If you are the highest bidder at the auction, you are or may be responsible for paying off all liens senior to the lien being auctioned off, before you can receive clear title to the property. You are encouraged to investigate the existence, priority, and size of outstanding liens that may exist on this property by contacting the county recorder's office or a title insurance company, either of which may charge you a fee for this information. If you consult either of these resources, you should be aware that the same lender may hold more than one mortgage or deed of trust on the property. NOTICE TO PROPERTY OWNER: The sale date shown on this notice of sale may be postponed one or more times by the mortgagee, beneficiary, trustee, or a court, pur suant to Section 2924g of the California Civil Code. The law requires that information about trustee sale postponements be made available to you and to the public, as a courtesy to those not present at the sale.
